ABSTRACT

The aim of the article is to describe the state of Matthean studies by means of Paul Ricoeur’s notion of the ‘hermeneutical arc’. The focus will be on the relationship of women in Matthew’s gospel to the male disciples. The article’s point of departure is that Matthean exegesis is at a crossroads. Pivotal to proceeding beyond the crossroads is the hermeneutical aspect of a willingness to suspect and a willingness to listen. Such a willingness includes suspicion with regard to outdated values explicitly advocated by the text and a genuine listening to unarticulated voices that remain hidden because of ideologies that render them inaudible. In the process of understanding, the focus should be on issues of morality rather than on the mere accumulation of knowledge. Seen from this perspective, the article provides a preview of facets in Matthean studies that could become prominent in future.

INTRODUCTION

‘Behind’ – ‘within’ – ‘in front of’

This year the renowned Bible Studies Colloquium in Leuven, Belgium had the state of present-day Matthean scholarship as its theme (cf. Colloquium Biblicum Lovaniense 2009). The focus of the colloquium was succinctly formulated as ‘The Gospel of Matthew at the crossroads of early Christianity’. Clearly, the intent was not ‘crossroads’ in a historical and geographical sense alone, but also in the temporal terms of location where exegetes find themselves today. Pivotal to proceeding beyond the crossroads is the hermeneutical aspect of a willingness to suspect and a willingness to listen, which was mostly absent during the discussions.

These words, ‘a willingness to suspect and a willingness to listen’, are those of Paul Ricoeur, expressed in an essay entitled ‘Freud and philosophy: An essay on interpretation’. The phrase is embedded in a paragraph with a striking ending, namely ‘[i]t may be that extreme iconoclasm belongs to the restoration of meaning’.1 Such willingness includes suspicion with regard to outdated values explicitly advocated by the text and a genuine listening to unarticulated voices that remain hidden because of ideologies that render them inaudible. This compact review aims to ‘hear into speech’ some of the silent voices of the history of biblical exegesis.

The presupposition of such a hermeneutics of suspicion is the conviction that a text cannot be read face value. Critical reading includes ‘both intuitive insight and political or theological suspicion’ (Thiselton [2001] 2006:607). When reading critically, the ‘hidden agendas’ of those who take part in the communicative events may be divulged. Hidden agendas are not always deliberately concealed or consciously present. Pealing through the layers of communication exposes the hidden meanings behind it (cf. Gadamer [1960] 1994:370).2

The idea of searching for meanings that are ‘behind’ originated during the time of transition from rationalism to romanticism at the turn of the 18th–19th century (see Thiselton 2006:607–624). Since that time, different perspectives (Sehe-Punkte) of different people have been recognised. They are points of view found behind the text (those of the author and her or his sources), within the text (those of explicit or implied narrated characters) and in front of the text (those of interpreters from the past and present). According to such an approach, a text is not seen as an ‘object’ to be simply ‘correctly understood’. Understanding begs respectful interaction with the text. In this regard, Johann Gottfried von Herder (1744–1803) and Friedrich Daniel Ernst Schleiermacher (1768–1834) were the hermeneutists ‘of the first importance’ (Forster 2008:n.p.; Schleiermacher [1974] 1977:112–113). Thiselton (2006:608–609) points out that ‘Schleiermacher did define the role of “New Testament Introduction” as a necessary way of reaching beyond the text to “understand” similarities, differences, genre, motivations and goals that the text presupposed’. However, the understanding that results from reaching ‘behind the text’ may transcend what the author had specifically intended and articulated.

1 ‘Hermeneutics seems to me to be animated by this double motivation: willingness to suspect, willingness to listen; vow of rigor, vow of obedience. In our time we have not finished doing away with idols and we have barely begun to listen to symbols. It may be that this situation, in its apparent distress, is instructive: it may be that extreme iconoclasm belongs to the restoration of meaning’ (Ricoeur 1970a:27).

2 Cf. Gadamer ([1960] 1994:370): ‘[t]hus a person who wants to understand must question what lies behind what is said. He must understand it as an answer to a question. If we go back behind what is said, then we inevitably ask questions beyond what is said. We understand the sense of the text only by acquiring the horizon of the question – a horizon that, as such, necessarily includes other possible answers. Thus a meaning of a sentence is relative to the question to which it is a reply, but that implies that its meaning necessarily exceeds what is said in it. As these considerations show then, the logic of the human sciences is a logic of the question.’
Different to Schleiermacher’s hermeneutics (see Thielson 1992:204–236), ‘formal structuralism’ defines a text as an entity in and of itself, which has to be understood as such. Information about the author and background could only ‘contaminate’ the ‘pure’ text and therefore also the hermeneutic enterprise (see Streidter 1989:50, 56). Thielson (2006:609–610) describes this movement – which became known as ‘the new criticism’ in the 1940s – as follows: ‘[t]he text was seen as an autonomous world of literary, poetic, linguistic, semantic, stylistic and semiotic forces.’ In this approach reaching ‘behind’ the text was replaced with the focus on meaning ‘within’ the text. According to Thielson, some scholars even regarded it as a ‘“paradigm shift” from history to “literature”’.

However, the so-called scientific objectivity of an ‘autonomous’ text was eventually recognised as an impossibility. It is not possible to divorce a text from its context of origin. Furthermore the perspective (Sche-Punkt) of the readers cannot be ignored. Thielson explains this development as follows: ‘[t]hence linguistic and semiotic structuralism collapsed into post-structuralism and formalism collapsed, in effect, into reader-response theory.’ Wolfgang Iser (1978:ix) puts it as follows: ‘[t]he text represents a potential effect that is realized in the reading process.’ In the interaction between the reader and the text meaning is produced.

The result was that the completed process of understanding is not an identification of the interpreter with the writer, but merely the grasping and appropriation of the writer’s intentions. Nor is reproduction identical to production. For this reason, the interpreter can understand the thoughts of writers better than they themselves understood them. The interpretation can bring nuances and aspects to the fore which were only subconsciously present in the original production. Writers can therefore say more than they intended and readers can understand more that the writers intended.

This approach with its focus on the reader has been described as a concern with what is ‘in front of the text’. However, a reading perspective ‘in front of’ the text does not exclude the meaning ‘behind’ and ‘within’ the text. With regard to this ‘integrated approach’ (Tate 1991:xvi), the influence of Ricoeur (1984:ix) can be noted. Though this approach seems fairly comprehensive according to Thielson, it does not take into account the world ‘beyond’ the text ‘to which the text may point, or which the text may presuppose’. Thielson (2006:611–612) points therefore to a fourth approach, namely the postmodern idea that texts are not ‘representational’ at all and that a definite ‘meaning’ cannot be captured.

PAUL RICOEUR AND THE SECOND NAÏVETÉ

The dilemma which the integrative approach creates is that it is not viable to try to be comprehensive in reviewing the history of the interpretation of even a single writing such as the Gospel of Matthew. An overview can at best be selective by focusing, for example, on a singular topic or a particular exegetical approach. The chord that keeps the diverse tones together in this paper is the notion of a ‘hermeneutical circle’. This concept derives from the Enlightenment, has developed throughout the modern era and has been adapted to fit postmodern literary theories today. The paper presents a ‘hermeneutic map’, the centre of which charts Ricoeur’s contribution. Both the theories of interpretation leading up to Ricoeur’s hermeneutics and those that have influenced its aftermath will be passed over, though exactly this history has produced the postmodern insight of ‘hermeneutic critique against hermeneutics’ (see e.g. Klemm 1986:203–208).

Not only did Ricoeur’s notion of the ‘hermeneutic arc’ offer a corrective to the unconvincing application of the concept of the ‘hermeneutic circle’, but it was also shown to be biased, especially through the critical theory of the so-called Frankfurt School. Critical theory was in fact meant as an alternative to the traditional hermeneutic approach. The consensus principle (merging of horizons) was not unquestioningly accepted without further ado. Such a criticism of hermeneutics is based on the assumption that a ‘merging of the horizon’ occurs in the communicative interaction process between subject and object and that an exchange of roles occurs at the same time. Object is subject. An illustration of the problem is that, if the object has for example internalised pain, for instance on account of systemic oppression, an exchange of roles cannot of itself entail that the experience of pain is recognised and identified as a problem. On the contrary, precisely because the object which is the bearer of pain now gains the status of subject, the possibility of recognition becomes even further obscured.

Against this background, critical theory promotes and encourages the ideal of non-manipulation and exploitation (see e.g. Adams 2006:106–125). Critical theory emphasises that what society regards as the ultimate good has not been or ever will be realised. Therefore, people in all societies are called upon to be constantly aware of the danger of manipulation and exploitation (see e.g. Wellmer 1976:231–263).

Mark Wallace (1990) describes the notion of the ‘hermeneutical circle’ as follows:

The hermeneutical circle, then, is a productive circle that consists of our first pregrasp of the text’s subject matter (understanding) and our later critical construal of the text’s constituent elements (explanation) which, in turn, sets up our pregrasp as a candidate for revision in order to enable a new understanding of the text’s subject matter (appropriation).

(Wallace [1990] 1995:60)

The ‘trialectics’ of understanding, explanation and appropriation correlates with Ricoeur’s hermeneutical arc of pre-figuration, con-figuration en re-figuration.

Ricoeur’s emphasis on narrativity in the hermeneutic process means that the involvement of readers/listeners in a story opens up the possibility of their being the ‘agent’ (not victim) of their own lives, in symmetrical interaction with others (see e.g. Ricoeur 1978:123–141, 1976:45–69, 1978:177–202, 1979:141–157; 1981; 1984; 1985). Reading is not simply about reading and listening. It is also about the reader/listener’s ability to tell his or her own story. Thus the relationship between text and reader/listener brings the reader/listener to self-understanding and an interpretation of the self. Prefiguration is about reaching the meaning ‘behind’ the text. Configuration is to comprehend the meaning ‘within’ the text. The birth of the ‘hermeneutical circle’ enables the existential new story as a result of interaction with the text is refiguration, appropriation. The new story can only be born when unacceptable and irrelevant values in the text are identified and rendered obsolete. This is accomplished by a ‘willingness to suspect’ and ‘willingness to listen’. This means that the text is also revived.

The aim of the article is to describe the state of Matthean scholarship by means of this hermeneutical arc. The focus will be on matters of gender, considering the relationship of women in Matthew’s gospel to the male disciples. The role of intertexts provides the material for the prefiguration (‘behind’ the text). Insights into the texture of Matthew provide the material for the configuration (‘within’ the text). Reconfiguration (‘in front of’ the text) will be demonstrated by means of examples of gender. By means of Matthean scholarship, the authors will explain the interconnection between gender, postcolonial and empire
Intertextuality is ‘less a name for a work’s relation to particular prior texts than a designation of its participation in the discursive space of culture’ (Culler [1981] 2001:103). Every text reflects the social context from which it is communicated.4 Ulrich Luz (2003) – probably the most renowned Matthean scholar of our time – asserted that, in his exegetical, historical and hernemonical work, he is grundsätzlich [fundamentally] interested in intertextuality as a source of a model in terms of which an author’s ideology and technique – what he calls Art und Weise [nature and manner] – can be uncovered. However, the crux of the matter is the question about whether the identified intertext is really connected to the author’s intention and whether the method used in identifying this intertext is properly applied. Luz comments:5 ‘Ultimately, intertextuality is nothing other than the textual form [textliche Gestalt] in which culture, history and society engrave themselves on texts’ (author’s translation from the original German). Textual form denotes ‘texture’, interwoven with culture, history and society. These three notions provide the conscious and subconscious echoes that reveal the world of either the author or the reader at a diachronic or synchronic level of interaction with the text.

Intertexts on the first level, that is, conscious echoes, include the sources of the text that disclose the memories of both the author and the intended readers embedded in these sources. They are memories that are not the author’s direct or implicit words. The stories of figures from a sacred history who serve as models of identity and behaviour for the author and/or reader(s). Intertexts on the second level, that is, subconscious echoes, pertain to codes that aesthetic theorists have highlighted in reception theories.

With regard to the ‘conscious echoes’ in the Gospel of Matthew, the ‘memories’ embedded in the Gospel and those of its intended readers through those text-internal signs can be referred to as the text’s encyclopaedia. However, codes should be provided for reading Matthew’s gospel within its cultural context.

To recognise the echoes of the world in which meaning is attributed to a text, a author and first readers need to be de-contextualised. This is done by means of a reconstruction of the authoritative intent by distinguishing between the ‘voices of sources’ and an author’s particular intent. These ‘voices’ constitute the so-called encyclopaedia of the document, what Gérard Genette (1982:7–16) calls ‘secondary texts’. He refers to them as the intertext, the paratext, the hypertext, the hypotext, the archetext and the metatext. The concept intertext refers, thus, to the occurrence of another text in a specific text.7

8. Alkier (2005:4) describes the concept encyclopaedia as follows: ‘[f]irst one has to choose an encyclopaedia that is relevant to the aim of the interpretation. Should one be interested only in the intentio operis pertaining to the time and culture of the production of the text, the encyclopaedia that is applicable at the production level of the text, will be used. As a consequence, only the relations to other texts guaranteed by the signs of the text will be investigated.’ I refer to this way of reading as production-oriented intertextuality. Should one want to investigate the history of reception, only the intertextual relations given in the texts of concrete readers are analysed. In this case the encyclopaedia of those concrete readings one wishes to investigate are to be used. This way of reading can be termed as reception-oriented intertextuality. Should one be interested in useful or interesting readings for today, the text can be creatively related to any other text in the expectation that this intertextual relation may generate interesting and rewarding effects of meaning. This being the case, the encyclopaedic knowledge of one’s own society must be applied. ‘This way of reading is called experimental intertextuality.’

9. E.g. quotations, copying as plagiarism, and allusions. In addition to intertext, there is also what is referred to as paratext, that is the occurrence of texts within another text, such as forewords, footnotes, marginal notes and even the title. Then, thirdly, there is the hypertext which is the type of text that was produced after a base text, the so-called hypertext, but which is neither taken up into the hypertext as the ‘first text’ (like an ‘intertext’) nor functions as a commentary on the ‘first text’ (like a ‘metatext’). (Virgil’s Aeneid, for example, is a ‘hypertext’ to the Odyssey as a ‘hypotext’.) An archetext refers to a generic text type which serves as a model for other texts, that is a Gütungstext. Finally, there is the so-called hypotext, such as a commentary which should be distinguished from the Grundtext (hypotext).

10. However, Peabody et al. do not convince the current authors with their arguments against the ‘Markan priority’ theory, or for that matter their endeavour to argue against the existence of the Q hypothesis (see McNicol, Dungan & Peabody 1996).
Matthew's texture represents the genre (architect) of a discursive-biographical gospel type and, as a result, the narrative and argumentative structure of this gospel is important. The Gospel of Mark as Matthew's hypotext represents the so-called biographical gospel type. An understanding of this architect has important heuristic consequences for the unravelling of the biographical community and the way the text is conceived within its texture, consisting of discourse alternating with biographical material. The five speeches should therefore be seen in relation to the narrative discourses which appear alongside and between them. This combination creates the analogy between Jesus' commission and the nature of the disciples' characterization. Each narrative discourse links up with the speech that follows it in an associative manner, which continues the spiral to the next narrative discourse and results in the integration of Jesus' commission with that of the disciples. Both the disciples and the Israelite crowd are present at the beginning of each speech by Jesus. These five speeches are directed at the disciples and have particular relevance to the relationship between the disciples and the Jewish crowd.

Although the 'Israelite crowd' (hoi ochloi/ho ochlos) and 'the Gentiles' (ta ethnē) do not fulfill the same character roles in Matthew's gospel, both groups function together as the object of the mission of Jesus and that of the disciples in the 'post-paschal' period (see Van Aarde 1994a:80–87). Both Judeans and Galileans during the Second Temple period referred to themselves as the 'people of God' or the 'people of Israel' (e.g. Mt 10:6). With regard to the followers of Jesus, Matthew does not depict them as 'Christians' but as 'people' (anthrōpoi, e.g. in Mt 4:19; or ethnos, e.g. in Mt 21:43) who constitute an ekklēsia (in contrast to a sunagōgē). These 'people' are seen as part of the 'house of Israel' which, for Matthew, also includes the 'sheep without a shepherd' (Mt 10:36). The latter expression refers to both Israelite outcasts and non-Israelites (the 'one sheep among the ninety-nine others' [Mt 18:12–14]).

Matthew's representation of the Joshua motif is transformed into a story about a choice of leadership. This choice is concretised in either the people's 'acknowledgement of Jesus (Joshua) as the Davidec Messiah who was commissioned by God to save all of Israel from its sins, or in their killing him and letting their descendants share the responsibility for his blood (Mt 27:25). Those who remain faithful to the 'law of the messiah', which is the 'Gospel of the Kingdom', will live in the presence of the God of Israel (Mt 28:18–20). In other words, the Joshua-Moses story functions as a hypertext. We have seen that the concept hypertext refers to the type of text that was produced by relying on a 'base text'. In Matthew's case, the base text was the Gospel of Mark. However, as has been noted already, Matthew developed as an independent narrative with an autonomous point of view. At the turn of the Common Era, against the background of the Pax Romana, the 'grand narrative' in Israel's history was the expectation of an apocalyptic saviour who would liberate God's people. First-century Pharisaic formative rabbinate forms the social-cultural context of Matthew's gospel, localised in the setting of various village synagogues. Matthew refers to his community as an ekklēsia built upon a rock established by Jesus' Father who is in heaven and not by 'flesh and blood' (Mt 16:17).

11. Cf. Michael J. Wilkins (1998:166) and see the discussion by Jeanine K. Brown (2002:9–12). In addition to among others the principal author's own view on Matthew's preaching activity (2005:105) presents a subtle, yet agreeable perspective on the role of the disciples in Matthew's story: '[i]n Matthew's concrete world, the disciples are not to be identified as transparent for the Matthewian community, in spite of the biographical nature of the text which once referred to the Temple's cult. Instead, the disciples' characterization functions as part of the way Matthew communicates the complex of values he wants to instil in his reader. These (or at least some of these) values may indeed address the issues facing Matthew's audience, but caution needs to be exercised before assuming a one-to-one correspondence between any one such value or theme and Matthew's concrete world.'

12. A similar view is found in Cousland (2002:285). Cousland formulates Matthew's ambivalence towards the crowds as follows: 'In other words, Matthew has not written the crowds out of the prospect of salvation. Their present lack of understanding is something that can be amended in the future.'

13. According to Gundry (2008:153), 'Matthew's Temple is surely an intra murus issue.' Gundry (2008:152) formulates Matthew's ambivalence towards the Temple as follows: '[t]he assertions by Lohr [1942:109–110, 1967:184] that Matthew is anti-Temple fail to distinguish between the Temple and the leaders responsible for it. Andonius's [1998:35–40] argument that Matthew is against the Temple because it represents the “old order” fails to account for Matthew's redaction of Markan texts or for positive statements about the Temple's cult. Instead, Matthew is an author “emphasizing the sovereignty of Jesus over the Temple rather than in the current authors' opinion correctly, that the expression ‘the lost sheep of the house of Israel’ is a ‘social and political description' of Israel. They, however, differ in the sense that Saldañin (1994:33) refers to the ‘main body of Israel’ and Wills (2007b:379) to an oppressed and marginalized remnant of the former Northern Kingdom of Israel. According to Van Aarde, 'all of Israel' is intended. Matthew probably had in mind ‘the leaders of Israel (as shepherds) [who are depicted with regard to outcasts (as sheep), namely that of lostness disregard, and [the disciples] are called upon to “continue” Jesus' God-with-us mission' (Van Aarde 2007:422).

14. The Gospel of Thomas and O Q are ‘sayings’ gospels and the Protoevangelium of James is a discursive gospel. Like Matthew, the Epitropa Apostolorum and the Acts of John are examples of a discursive-biographical gospel type (see Crossan 1998:31–40).

16. The speeches: Mt 5:1; 9:37; 10:1; 13:10; 18:1; 23:11; the Israelite crowd: Mt 4:23–
God’s people are safeguarded in this community, though they are like lost sheep without a shepherd, bearing in mind how their own leaders were corrupted with powerful individuals whose power was sanctioned by Rome.

The voices of the marginalised and their stories would have become unheard if it were not for people such as the author of Matthew’s gospel who, in his own words in Matthew 13:52, became like a ‘scribe trained for God’s kingdom’ and who told his ‘little story’ in the light of Israel’s history. His story about a new-born Joshua deconstructs the coalition between first-century Roman imperialism and Pharisaism as the ‘metanarrative’/‘grand narrative’ of that time. Dorothy Jean Weaver put it as follows: ‘[a]ccordingly, while the emperor himself is not an “onstage” actor within Matthew’s narrative, it is evident that his impact on the lives of the occupied populace extends both to the most mundane aspects of daily life and to the most terrifying of human catastrophes’ (Weaver 2005:114). However, it is at this point that a ‘willingness to suspect and a willingness to listen’ becomes a hermeneutical necessity.

According to Warren Carter (2001:178), Matthew’s gospel paradoxically criticises imperialism on the one hand, but foresees God’s coming triumph in the language of his own ‘imperialist hopes’ – and this means that ‘God’s coming triumph concerns the violent means by which God’s empire is imposed’. Carter here refers to the ‘eschatological’ dimensions in Matthew’s language. Such a ‘violent imposition is at odds with the way in which the Gospel conveys the empire to be at work in the present in communities of service, inclusion, healing, relieving need, mercy’. Carter (2001:178) does not want ‘violence to be the final word in imposing God’s empire’, because ‘[t]hat would make God nothing other than a copy of any emperor’. His solution is to eliminate this type of language: ‘Without an imperial mindset there can be reconciliation and transformation’ (Carter 2001:179). Carter’s identification of a dichotomy between the present peacable presence and the violent future imposition in Matthew’s thinking (Carter 2003:467–487) represents a praiseworthy hermeneutics of suspicion. It tries to neutralise violence by means of ‘non-imperial terms such as “reconciliation” and “transformation” in the establishment of “God’s just world” – because these terms are ‘more consistent with the Gospel’s vision of God’s work in the present’ (Carter 2001:178).

Yet, the critical question is whether the author of Matthew’s gospel is ‘consistent’ also with regard to his own prejudices, or whether it could be that his own male-dominated patriarchal domesticization constituted a similar obstacle that he as author, for example, confronted Peter with words that were put in the mouth of Jesus: ‘[g]et behind me, Satan! You are a hindrance to me; for you are not on the side of God, but of men’ (Mt 16:23). The obstacle is that even the author could not escape his own metanarrative of male-dominated patriarchal domestication. Therefore, also with regard to Matthew’s gospel, the truism is that gender matters if the exegete is willing ‘to suspect and to listen’.

GENDER MATTERS IN MATTHEW

In the first-century Mediterranean world, hierarchical patriarchy was part and parcel of imperial politics. Current empire studies go hand-in-hand with postcolonial hermeneutics (see Sugirtharajah 2004:22–38). The latter, in turn, has been induced by feminist theories (see eds. Ashcroft, Griffiths & Tiffin [1995] 2009:233–259; Kwok 2005). Exegesis of Matthew’s gospel from a feminist hermeneutical perspective has produced important insights.22 Positioned in front of Matthew’s text from a gender-sensitive perspective – knowing that outdated patriarchal values could be harmful to women and others – one cannot but see how women and women’s experiences of power and male control and the androcentric self-interest of the authors and interpreters of the texts behind and within Matthew’s gospel.

Recent mainstream Jesus studies have shown that women were welcomed in an ‘egalitarian’ way and made an important contribution to the earliest Christian faith community.23 This stands in stark contrast to the silencing and invisibility of women in the patriarchal world of the Middle East. Probably the only overtly ‘misogynist’ passage in Matthew is the parable of the wise and foolish women. Marie-Eloise Rosenblatt ([1993] 2001:171–195) acknowledges the misogynist implications of the parable, but points out that Matthew does portray the women in this passage in a positive light. However, this insight does not mean that Matthew’s story is not told from a dominating, androcentric narrator’s point of view. Carolyn Osiek, confronting Jerome Neyrey’s (1998:65–66) discussion of domestic ‘gendered space’ in Matthew’s gospel, emphasises that in Matthew ‘gender differentiation’ is more subtle. To the current authors, what Osiek indicates with regard to Matthew’s evasion of ‘any diminution of honor’ for males and the evangelist’s dodging of ‘feminisation’ in Matthew’s Sermon on the Mount are demonstrable in other sections in Matthew’s gospel as well. It is not only the ‘entire Sermon on the Mount [that] is intended for a male audience’,24 but the entire writing.25

In the Matthean community, women were not seen as equal participants. Shin (2007) puts it as follows:

Male followers are called to be disciples; female followers are called to serve. It is very possible that women were not allowed into public places in ancient times. The Gospel of Matthew’s narrative world is an embodied androcentrism situation. (Shin 2007:407)

The Gospel of Matthew does include women and other formerly excluded people in the faith community. They even become equal recipients of the love of God. According to the Matthean narrator’s point of view, women fulfilled a supportive rather than initiating role (Mt 1:22; 9:18–26; 15:21–28); double standards were applied to male and female sexuality and women’s sexuality was regarded with prejudice (Mt 5:29–32; 19:2–12); women were given the opportunity to live ‘authentically’, but only if this ‘authenticity’ was sanctioned by men (Mt 20:20–23; 27:38; 27:56).

The Gospel of Matthew is about how to understand and do the will of God. According to Knowles (2008:123), it is as if Matthew makes ‘the voice of God in Scripture his own’. Knowles (2008:131) continues: ‘Jesus was not “God with us” from infancy (1:23, cf. 18:20), so he speaks through it with the voice of God, not only echoing and appropriating God’s words from of old but definitely interpreting and even overriding that ancient voice with words of his own’.

Inferred from the narrator’s point of view, there is reason to be concerned that Jesus’ followers will adopt the Pharisees’ idea of 23 Terms such as ‘egalitarian’ and ‘equity’ are modern-day concepts (see Elliott 2003:173–210). To avoid etnocentrism or anachronism one should rather refer to Matthew’s tendency of indituality (see e.g. Shen & Van Aarde 2005:1303–1372).

24 ‘The entire Sermon on the Mount is intended for a male audience. The potential murderer is angry with a brother (9:21–22); the potential adulterer looks at a woman with lust (5:28); the potential divorcer divorces his wife (9:31–32); the potential reiterator should not look down to a woman (9:40); and so on. The verses on prayer are no exception. Thus, the exhortations about secrecy of almsgiving, prayer, and fasting are quite countercultural. The male listener, lover of public recognition of his worth, is expected to forego that reward (Osiek 2009:737). Osiek (2009:737) continues: ‘[t]he voice of God is corrected in assuming that these verses are part of the radical rewriting of honor that Christian preaching entailed. The honorable place to pray is the house, not the synagogue or public square. Jesus’ seeming preference for the house over public space is mirrored in the preferences given here’ (cf. Neyrey 1998:218–220, 2004:65–66).

25 ‘There is no doubt that the author of the Gospel of Matthew wrote an androcentric perspective. Whether that author was male or female, the story world embodies patriarchal assumptions. There are many examples which illustrate the pervasive androcentrism’ (Anderson 2001:29).
God’s will. In the context of the revitalisation of villages after the destruction of the temple in Jerusalem, Matthew’s community struggled to come to terms with the loss of Jerusalem and the temple. They had to define God’s presence in the environment of village communities, while they experienced conflict with synagogal authorities who resisted their acknowledgement of Jesus as the messianic ‘second Moses’ and the one who challenged the traditional Mosaic view that the temple cult regulated the Torah (Van Aarde 2005:7–32).

In such a world of ‘scribes and sages’ a ‘bias against women’ occurred frequently (for example Awt 2:7: ‘[m]ore flesh, more worms; more wealth, more contention; more maidservants, more lewdness; more slaves, more theft; more women, more witchcraft; more Torah, more life’ (Stemberger 2008:303)). According to Richard Horsley (2007), referring to Ben Sin’s teaching about women, the husband-father has a special concern about being completely in control and the strict obedience of wives …. This need for security and control in the marriage and home is very likely related to scribes’ lack of control in their relations with their superiors who exercised control over them. (Horsley 2007:68)

And with regard to Matthew’s narrative point of view, Celia Deutsch (2001) bitterly remarks:

[I]n the closing words of the Gospel, the risen Jesus bids his disciples to make disciples of all nations, ‘teaching them to obey everything that I have commanded you …’ (28:20), presumably referring to the teaching contained in the gospel and continued by the scribes of Matthew’s community. These scribes, as far as I can tell, are male. Norwalk does the evangelist offer female teachers as models of learned leadership. (Deutsch 2001:105)

Again, Matthew’s specific perspective, objective and message can be detected when he changes his Markan source. Mark is explicit about the male followers of Jesus having failed to understand their calling as disciples (Malbon 1983:33). Mark uses women characters to fill the gap (Kinukawa 2001:189).26 The disciples are the followers who better understand what Jesus’ message is all about and nearly succeed in fulfilling his ideal. In Matthew, the male followers do understand (Mt 13:51; over against Mk 4:13), but they struggle to get it right. They cannot fully adopt Jesus’ understanding of the Torah and end up being like the Pharisees who do not have insight into the righteousness that exceeds that of their scribes (Mt 5:20). By changing Mark, Matthew changes the roles of both the disciples and the women in order to be more acceptable in his Israelite-Palestinian context.

In Matthew, women are clearly distinguished from the twelve disciples/apostles. Along with all the other marginalised categories of people who did not have access to the temple, women are the receivers of Jesus’ love and therefore have free access to God. Although they receive that love they are not the agents who transmit that love to others. They do not take the initiative. The positive side of Matthew’s perspective on women is the message that God’s love is inclusive. The negative element is that agency is the exclusive prerogative of males.

Why does Matthew go this route? It seems that he does not expect his readers to break completely with their Israelite culture. This becomes clear from the way in which he utilises his Markan source. Mark does not change his Markan source. Mark is explicit about the male followers of Jesus having failed to understand their calling as disciples (Malbon 1983:33). Mark uses women characters to fill the gap (Kinukawa 2001:189).26 The disciples are the followers who better understand what Jesus’ message is all about and nearly succeed in fulfilling his ideal. In Matthew, the male followers do understand (Mt 13:51; over against Mk 4:13), but they struggle to get it right. They cannot fully adopt Jesus’ understanding of the Torah and end up being like the Pharisees who do not have insight into the righteousness that exceeds that of their scribes (Mt 5:20). By changing Mark, Matthew changes the roles of both the disciples and the women in order to be more acceptable in his Israelite-Palestinian context.

In Matthew, women are clearly distinguished from the twelve disciples/apostles. Along with all the other marginalised categories of people who did not have access to the temple, women are the receivers of Jesus’ love and therefore have free access to God. Although they receive that love they are not the agents who transmit that love to others. They do not take the initiative. The positive side of Matthew’s perspective on women is the message that God’s love is inclusive. The negative element is that agency is the exclusive prerogative of males.

Why does Matthew go this route? It seems that he does not expect his readers to break completely with their Israelite culture. This becomes clear from the way in which he utilises his Markan source. Were he to take Mark’s message over as is, it would have meant breaking with cultural conventions. In the Israelite world, it was unthinkable to place women in such a central position as Mark does. Mark’s compromise is that he does include women in God’s love, but women remain subordinate to men. The role of the women characters in the story is that, through them, it is shown whether the males fulfil their calling or not. How Matthew relegates women to being supporting characters only can be seen in the way in which he reports on women such as Mary, the Canaanite mother and the mother of the sons of Zebedee.

The value of women in society was that they should help build the nation (the children of Abraham). They were to bear sons. However, just bearing sons was not enough. Women also had to be acceptable and honourable. The sons of a dishonourable woman (such as a prostitute or an unmarried mother) did not count as children of Abraham. According to Matthew (Mt 3:9), God is able to raise up children for Abraham from stones. God does not need ‘holy seed’ for that. This is illustrated in the life of the humble woman from Bethlehem, Mary. She is unmarried and pregnant, but Joseph is obedient to God and takes her into his home in spite of her dishonourable position. Matthew attempts to convince his readers that Mary is acceptable. He does this by including four unacceptable women in the genealogy. A marked difference between the gospels is that Joseph, the patriarch, plays the leading role in the Gospel of Matthew – God speaks to him – whereas Luke gives the leading role to Mary – God speaks to her. In Matthew, Mary quickly recedes into the background. She does not sing the Magnificat (Lk 1:46–55) and she is not part of the story of the 12-year-old whose wisdom surpasses that of the learned men in the temple (Lk 2:46–52). In the story of the flight to Egypt, which is told only in Matthew (2:13–18), Mary is not mentioned, only Joseph (Mt 2:13). Mary is also not present among the women who witness Jesus’ death on the cross (Mt 27:55–56).

In the same vein, Matthew changes Mark’s Syrophoenician woman (non-Israelite person from beyond the borders) to a Canaanite woman (non-Israelite, but from within the borders of Palestine). However, Mark and Matthew differ when it comes to foreigners. Matthew brings the foreigners in. Mark and Paul go out to meet them in their own world. In Matthew, Jesus focuses on the ‘lost sheep of the house of Israel’ (Mt 10:6; 15:24). The ‘kingdom’ where Jesus reigns as the ‘Son of Man’ is open to all who come from the ‘four corners of the earth’ (Mt 24:31). This ‘kingdom’ takes the place of ‘Israel’ and the ‘Son of Man’ is the king (Mt 19:28). In this ‘kingdom’ the roles are reversed: the first are last and the last are first (Mt 19:30; 20:16). According to Matthew, the disciples are the ones who are to bring all the nations (panta ta ethne) into the inclusive church: to baptise them, to make disciples of them and to teach them to do what Jesus had done (Mt 28:16–20).

In Matthew, the first feeding of the multitude also takes place in Israelite territory (Mt 14:13–21). Jesus and the disciples step into a boat but do not cross over to the foreigners. The boat returns to Israelite territory, where the second feeding of the multitude takes place (Mt 15:32–39). All do indeed receive bread, the multitude, the foreign woman, but they receive it in Israelite territory. The foreigners are to be brought into the fold. In Matthew, the disciples take the initiative to inform Jesus that the people are hungry (Mt 8:1–2). When Jesus asks them to distribute the bread they are not overly enthusiastic about the miracle, but do the job (Mt 6:30). On the other side, in foreign territory, they are not concerned about the hungry people; there, Jesus takes the initiative. When Jesus asks them to distribute the bread, they are unwilling (Mt 8:4). In Matthew, both take place in Israelite territory. He does not change Mark’s story about who notices that the people are hungry. He does change the reaction of the disciples. Matthew’s disciples simply do the job without complaining (see Van Aarde 1994a:180–203).

After feeding the multitude, Jesus and his disciples again get into a boat. Jesus asks the disciples whether they have brought bread. They do not understand that he does not mean it literally, but is referring back to the wonder of the feeding of the multitude. Jesus warns them of the yeast of the Pharisees. Unleavened bread is a negative image. The Pharisees are also supposed to give bread, but they do it without love. They also only give to their own kind. Their bread does not nourish. It is not a wonderful gift of God. The disciples’ reaction is different in Matthew. In Mark, they do not understand what it is all about (Mk 8:21). According to Matthew, although they understand they do not fully grasp the implications. Matthew tells the story of the Canaanite woman so that the disciples can realise that the bread is not only meant for Israel but for all marginalised people – foreigners, women and children. Matthew’s readers were familiar with the rabbi’s exposition of the Hebrew Scriptures. The story of Ruth provided a model for how foreigners could become part of God’s people (see Moore 1998:203–217). Like Ruth, a proselyte had to pass the test three times (see Jackson 2002:126–140, 2003:779–792). Twice the proselyte was refused. Should they insist a third time that they were really serious about becoming part of Israel, then they were welcomed into the Israelite community. Twice Naomi told the Canaanite woman that the bread was actually meant for the ‘lost sheep of Israel’ (Mt 15:24). When she insisted a third time that she, as a ‘dog’ (gentile), could surely get the crumbs from the table, she passed the test (Bamberger 1968:15). The difference between Mark’s and Matthew’s stories is that Mark allows the woman to speak for herself, whereas Matthew tells the story himself. Yet again Matthew renders the woman voiceless. Elaine Wainwright (2001:127), who gives the name which the Pseudo-Clementine Epistles give to the Canaanite mother, namely Justa, back to her, says that ‘a silent voice is further silenced’.

Another case study is the nameless mother of the ‘sons of Zebedee’. In Mark (10:35–40) the sons of Zebedee seek honorary positions for themselves at the right hand and left hand of Jesus. In Matthew, it is their mother who wants these positions for her sons. A woman’s status depended on having sons and on how well her sons did in life. When Matthew changes his Markan source to turn the woman into the one seeking the honour for her sons, he reveals his attitude towards women and their place in society. He portrays the woman and mother in a negative light. In the story, the mother is put in her place. She is an eyewitness (Mt 27:56) of Jesus’ crucifixion between two robbers who receive the ‘honorary positions’ at his right hand and left hand (Mt 27:38). So she is chastised: in the kingdom of God it should not be about ‘honorary positions’ at his right hand and left hand (Mt 27:38). She has not constituted the exegetical agenda. Mathematics is the only gospel where the mother of the sons of Zebedee plays a role.

A PROJECTION

In his recently published commentary, John Nolland (2005) remarks:

Matthew seems to have understood himself to be creating a foundational text to which people would feel the need to return again and again. And that is what the church has done with his Gospel throughout its history.

(Nolland 2005:22)

It comes therefore as no surprise that voluminous commentaries on Matthew’s gospel are produced nowadays. Indeed, Matthew studies are at a crossroads. However, the question is: do we really experiencing a change of route, or does reality point to business as usual? It seems to the current authors that the latter could be the case, even when Matthew scholars take France’s words to heart: ‘[t]o read Matthew in blissful ignorance of first-century sociopolitics is to miss his point’ (France 2007:7).

Fifteen years ago, in an appeal for ‘engaged hermeneutics’ with regard to responsible morality in light of the postmodern shift of paradigm (Van Aarde 1994b:584–585), the principal author cited Herbert Butterfield’s (1975:1) words that we need to ‘put on a different kind of thinking cap’. Based on two respective citations from Butterfield’s (1975) The origins of modern science: 1300–1800 and Kahn’s ([1957] 1979) The Copernican revolution, Kopfensteiner (1992) puts it as follows:

A shift of paradigm will result in ‘handling the same bundle of data as before, but placing them in a new system of relations with one another by giving them a different framework, all of which virtually means putting on a different kind of thinking cap’. A scientific revolution has a dual nature; it is ‘at once ancient and modern, conservative and radical’. To some practitioners the new paradigm will be the point of departure for previously unanticipated scientific activity; to others, however, the new paradigm will seem curiously akin to its predecessors …. Hence, each evolutionary niche evolves out of the world differently, but never independently of its predecessors …. The epistemological discussion within philosophy and history of science has shown that … [the reciprocity of tradition and the emancipation accounts for moral progress. At each evolutionary niche, new possibilities of being-in-the-world are opened up to human freedom. This is the meaning of a shift of paradigm in a moral context. (Kopfensteiner 1992:24–27)

To the current authors, in our present-day ‘global village’, morality is a crucial matter which has to be deployed in the hermeneutical enterprise. Morality is a core element of the ‘new framework’ in terms of which existing data from the huge amount of Matthew scholarship has been accessed in the last few decades. Although ethics was not really a forgotten interpretative issue for Matthean scholars, morality, however, has not constituted the ecclesiastical agenda.

There are exceptions to the rule, such as Lidija Novakovic (2009) and we are encouraged to join them:

In the world governed by military and political power and divided across ethnic and religious lines, Matthew’s Gospel offers a new vision of human relationships. On the one hand, it encourages the underprivileged to work for a change of conventional hierarchies that favour the privileged. It restores the lost dignity of the inferiors and calls them to engage in the creation of just relationships. It empowers the excluded by giving them hope that they can have equal share in the abundance of God’s grace. And it appeals to those in power to become attentive to the needs of the distressed and serve them as if they were serving Jesus himself. At the same time, Matthew issues a warning that those who manage to improve their conditions and find themselves in a position of power should not replicate unjust relationships.

(Novakovic 2009:579)

In the historical-critical paradigm, Matthew studies disclose an ellipse, a ‘square circle’ that could break if the poles are stretched too far. With regard to the so-called transparency theory, the issue of social location meant that Jerusalem in Matthew’s story-world forms the one pole against Antioch in Matthew’s narrated-world. With regard to Matthew’s references to people, the disciples and the crowd in the story-world create the one pole and the first-century ecclesial community as the narrator’s implied audience the other pole. Both social location and the characters in Matthew’s story constituted a ‘theological issue’ in the interpretation of Matthew’s gospel, and that concerns the so-called particularism–universalism debate, which creates a ‘theologoumenon’ such as the question as to whether the Jesus followers were in Matthew’s eyes a ‘third race’ (Graham 1999) rather than being either Jewish-Christians or Christian-Jews (Anthony Saldarini/Andrew Overman). Part and parcel of this ‘theological issue’ is the David Sim–Robert Gundry–Donald Hagner–Joel Willits debate with regard to either Matthew’s ‘anti-Paulinism’ or Matthew’s ‘gentile bias’.

Today, when ‘new’ buzz words are deployed in Matthew studies, such as ‘intertexts’, the central matter of morality needs to be made integral to our theoretical reflections. It includes also the focus on aspects such as the socio-historical context and the political contexts of the first and present readers. From recent 27 According to Paul Hertig (1989), the ‘first horizon’ and ‘second horizon’ respectively.

{(Kopfensteiner 1992:47, 57)
Matthew studies, one can observe how the political dimension is approached from the perspectives of gender, postcolonial and empire studies. We need to take into consideration the matter of morality as well, also when addressing exegetical and theological issues in Matthew’s gospel such as:

- the understanding of the destruction of the Israelite temple-state
- the probable social location and constitution of the Matthean community
- apocalyptic-sectarian theories and marginalisation theories.

The current authors’ case study, namely Matthew’s male-dominated characterisation of women, is an example of how morality could play a role when we discuss the usual exegetical matters – even if the hermeneutical enterprise consists of only recycling old insights and approaches disguised in the vocabulary of a new thesaurus.

At least, what might be appropriated in a sense of a second naïveté is what Victoria Phillips (2001:234) refers to as a ‘process of transforming consciousness’. She points out that “[i]ntegral to that transformation is consciousness-raising.” A route to this process is ‘the telling of stories’. She quotes Harrison (1985):

Conscientisation involves recognition that what we have experienced in isolation and silence, a private pain is in fact a public, structural dynamic. My life is now perceived in a new way in light of your stories. Together we slowly re-visual our reality so that what happened, originally, to be an individual or personalized ‘problem’ or even a human ‘failing’, is exposed as a basic systemic pattern of injustice. (Harrison 1985:243)

By amending Phillips’ (2001:234) reading of the end of Mark’s gospel, we would like to apply her open-ended remarks to Matthew’s entire narrative point of view – and with such an in-/conclusion express our opinion about where the ‘last play landed’28 with regard to current Matthew studies: ‘[e]xploring the dynamics that silenced the women who followed Jesus is a way to contribute to such re-visions.’
