Show, tell and re-enact: The reason why the earliest followers of Jesus found the Eucharist meaningful

The purpose of this article has been to examine how the earliest followers of Jesus experienced the Eucharist. What was their reason for participating in the Eucharist? What kind of value did this rite add to their lives? What was the meaning attached to it? In the end, this approach might assist us to gain a deeper understanding of this ‘early Christian’ rite, which, in turn, could help us to comprehend what kind of value the Eucharist could add to our lives today.

Introduction
Purpose

The earliest evidence\(^1\) that we possess indicates that the Eucharist played an important role in the lives of the first followers of Jesus from the very beginning.\(^2\) In one way or another, many Christians in a Eurocentric world today still participate in this rite, but it is debatable whether Westerners religiously experience this sacrament of the contemporary institutionalised church in a similarly meaningful way, compared to how it was experienced 2000 years ago.

The purpose of this article is to examine how the earliest followers of Jesus experienced the Eucharist. What was their reason for participating in this rite? What kind of value did this rite add to their lives? What was the meaning attached to it? In the end, this approach might assist us to gain a deeper understanding of this ‘early Christian’ rite, which, in turn, could help us to comprehend what kind of value the Eucharist could add to our lives today.

I am of the opinion that this investigation could be especially fruitful, because institutionalised churches today are entering a phase of deinstitutionalisation\(^3\) that we possess indicates that the Eucharist played an important role in the lives of the first followers of Jesus from the very beginning.\(^2\) In one way or another, many Christians in a Eurocentric world today still participate in this rite, but it is debatable whether Westerners religiously experience this sacrament of the contemporary institutionalised church in a similarly meaningful way, compared to how it was experienced 2000 years ago.

The purpose of this article is to examine how the earliest followers of Jesus experienced the Eucharist. What was their reason for participating in this rite? What kind of value did this rite add to their lives? What was the meaning attached to it? In the end, this approach might assist us to gain a deeper understanding of this ‘early Christian’ rite, which, in turn, could help us to comprehend what kind of value the Eucharist could add to our lives today.

I am of the opinion that this investigation could be especially fruitful, because institutionalised churches today are entering a phase of deinstitutionalisation\(^3\) (cf. Dreyer 2004:920, 929–932; Fox 1990:15–18; Van Aarde 1995) and this rite came into being before formative Christianity became an institution. Where some postmodern believers might want to disperse of everything that reminds them of the institutionalised church (cf. Schutte 2004), this article could assist them to realise once again what the value of the Eucharist could be, without the tag of ‘formalism’ being attached to this rite.

Rites

In the 1st century Mediterranean world, religion did not function as an isolated phenomenon in culture. The social world and the symbolic universe as a ‘sacred canopy’ mutually influenced each other (see Berger 1967:3–51). In this holistic, symbolic and social world the Eucharist was a symbolic event which was meaningful for people.

The Eucharist can be described as a rite. The term ‘rites’ can be understood as a general concept that covers both rituals and ceremonies (Neyrey 1990:76). Rites are closely connected to purity. In the words of Malina (1986:21), purity concerns the socially contrived lines through time and space

---

1. Here I refer to the documents included in the New Testament and other early apocryphal documents that are related to this theme, as well as the writings of the church fathers.

2. With regard to the way in which I describe the people we read about in the Bible, the reader should note the following: Throughout this article I use the terms ‘Israelites’ or ‘Israelite’, instead of ‘Jews’ or ‘Jewish’, because the latter is an anachronism. The term ‘Judean’ (not ‘Jew’), a translation of Ιουδαίοι, is a regional designation for an inhabitant of Judea (‘Judeus’), in distinction from, for example, an inhabitant of Galilee (Γαλαται) (see Pfeil 1997a:119–125). I refer to the temple-centred religion of both Judeans and Galileans as the religion of post-exilic ‘Israelites’. ‘Insiders’ who supported the ideology of the Second Temple, referred to themselves as the ‘people of God’ or the ‘house of Israel’ (e.g. Mt 10:6) (see Elliott 1995:76). Geographically perceived, Galilee and Idumea, which were situated concentrically around Judea, were regarded as regions with a lesser claim to purity than Judah. There were two reasons for this: they were further away from Jerusalem and the temple and they were populated by people from ‘mixed’ marriages (marriages between Israelites and non-Israelites), who were regarded as ‘outsiders’. But Idumea and Galilee were still part of the ‘house of Israel’. From the perspective of Israel, outsiders were often stereotyped as ‘non-Israel’. They were referred to as ἐβρικ, which is usually translated as ‘Gentile’. The term χριστιανοί (‘Christians’) is a similar example of stereotyping used by Judeans and Romans to refer to Jesus-followers in, for example, Syria (see Ac 11:26). Therefore, from an ‘in-group’ perspective, the term ‘Christians’ is not a suitable description for the very first followers of Jesus. (I therefore employ inverted commas when I do need to use these terms in this article.)

---

© 2011. The Authors. Licensee: OpenJournals Publishing. This work is licensed under the Creative Commons Attribution License.
that human groups maintain in order to create and discover meaning (see Segal 1989:142). Once a group develops a set of lines, there are all sorts of reasons and occasions for focusing on the lines, either to cross them or to maintain and strengthen them. Social behaviours concerned with crossing lines constitute rituals, whilst those concerned with maintaining or strengthening purity lines comprise ceremonies. Crossing the lines between being unbaptised and being baptised is an example of a ritual – an event that focuses on the transition to a new, socially recognised state with a resulting change in role or status for the individual concerned. The Eucharist, on the other hand, is an example of a ceremony – an event that places the focus on those within a group and reinforces the lines that distinguish the members of the group from those of other groups (Malina 1986:21–22; see Esler 2003:210–211; Groenewald 2005:143–145). Ceremonies are predictable and occur regularly; they are determined, called for and presided over by officials; and they function to confirm roles and statuses within the chief institutions of the group (Neyrey 1991:362–363).

The earliest followers of Jesus separated themselves from their ‘parent body’, the House of Israel, to find their own identity (see Collins 1989:38–39). To symbolise their entrance into their new group (the ‘family of God’) as a legitimate crossing of a boundary, baptism served as the ritual of initiation and transformation of status in the context of the earliest Jesus-groups (cf. Turner 1987:380–383, 386; see Groenewald 2005:169–236). Members of this ‘new’ community practiced a new lifestyle. This was symbolised by their participation in the Eucharist, which can be termed an all-inclusive ceremony of integration (Theißen 1999:121).

Extensive research has already been carried out on the origins of the Eucharist. Research, however, has not indicated whether this ceremony of participation could be newly explained by taking the contemporary knowledge of alternate states of consciousness into consideration.

Alternate states of consciousness

Alternate states of consciousness can be described as qualitative and quantitative alterations in the overall pattern of mental functioning relative to some state of consciousness chosen as a baseline, so that a person will experience his or her consciousness as different from the way it functions in the baseline state (Erickson & Rossi 1981:242, 248; Pilch 2004:2; Tart 2000:257). Erika Bourguignon (1979:236) defines alternate states of consciousness as:

- conditions in which sensations, perceptions, cognition and emotions are altered. They are characterized by changes in sensing, perceiving, thinking and feeling. They modify the relation of the individual to self, body, sense of identity, and the environment of time, space or other people.

Whatever is experienced as the baseline state of consciousness in any given cultural setting is a construct and not a given. Our levels of consciousness change constantly throughout the day. Cultural forces select and prescribe from the broad spectrum of human potentialities those elements which are to be described as ‘normal/ordinary’ (Craftert 2002:66–67; Tart 1982:245; see Lewis 1989:5).

In the light of social-scientifically oriented studies, we know on account of cross-cultural anthropological investigations that only ten percent of people all over the world today do not experience common alternate states of consciousness, whilst the rest of humanity do (Bourguignon 1974:229–232; Pilch 2002c:33–34).

Research demonstrates that the premodern mythical world of the biblical period stands in continuity with this finding – people who lived in the 1st century Mediterranean world experienced alternate states of consciousness as an ordinary part of life (see Bourguignon 1974:232, 1979:236; Pilch 1996a:133). Only in the Eurocentric world have we – the ten percent exception to the rule – started to interpret the Eucharist as a cognitive dogmatic construct (cf. Kleinman 1988:50–51).

Anti-language

In our contemporary context we can perform empirical research into the experience of individuals. But it is not possible to determine what individuals experienced 2000 years ago when the earliest followers of Jesus developed their Eucharistic rites.

My hypothesis is that the participation, ritually expressed by the ‘sacrament’ of the Eucharist, can be ‘better’ explained against the background of alternate states of consciousness.

This anthropological phenomenon termed alternate states of consciousness has recently been applied to biblical studies, pioneered by John J. Pilch (1981–2004). However, research into alternate states of consciousness creates a theoretical problem because, even though these states can be experienced simultaneously by more than one person in a group, experiences of alternate states of consciousness represent individual, mental, psychological states (cf. Lewis 1989:5; Richeport 1984). In other words, without empirical evidence of what an individual has really experienced during an alternate state of consciousness, research is jeopardised, because of the impossibility of ascertaining the religious meaning and value attributed to a specific alternate state of consciousness experience. Yet, we do have texts as well as archaeological and paleontological findings which show that there is a correlation between alternate states of consciousness and a participation in the ‘dying and rising’ of 5Van Huyssteen (1988:88) remarks that explanatory progress in theology points to an increase in intelligibility. This is the reason why, epistemologically, I explain ‘progress’ in science in terms of the words ‘explanation’ and ‘better’. Van Huyssteen (1988:88) says: ‘Explanatory progress, as a form of inference from the best available explanation in terms of either hermeneutical, theological or philosophical criteria, can therefore indeed be established retrospectively by indicating how a later interpretation improves on its predecessors – and because of the reality depiction of theological statements this need not be an instrumentalist or pragmatist notion of progress.’

---

4I choose to use the term ‘alternate’ states of consciousness, because, as Zinberg (1977:1, n. 1) comments, it is a ‘plural, all-inclusive term’.
deities, symbolised by ‘blood’ ceremonies such as enactments of sacrificial atonement.

This, I propose, can be seen in the ‘anti-language’ utilised by the first Jesus-groups. Anti-language is the language that is used by an anti-society, which, in turn, can be described as a conscious alternative to another society (Halliday 1976:570–584, 1986:164–182; see Groenewald 1995:31–39). The earliest Jesus-followers formed an anti-society, into which they were initiated by means of baptism and in which they participated by means of the Eucharist.

The earliest followers of Jesus wished to say something about Jesus’ alternative lifestyle, which they re-enacted. The lifestyle he advocated differed in many ways from the norms and the customs of the day. Jesus proclaimed that to be a part of the kingdom of God was the opposite of being a part of the kingdom of Caesar (Van Aarde 2000:10; cf. Elliott 2002:86; Koester 1992:10–13; Malina 2001:1). Because the earliest Jesus-followers were marginalised by the Israelite parent body (with its hierarchical temple structure and sacrifice tradition), as well as by the Roman Empire (where recognition was to be given to Caesar, who was perceived as a deity, in every activity and where refusal was interpreted as treason) (see Barr 1998:127, 164–179), they formed an alternative community with an apocalyptic worldview. Since apocalypticism has to do with the revelation of God’s alternative world in the real world, it can be seen as an alternate state of consciousness phenomenon. The earliest followers of Jesus projected a better future promised by God – a promise that functioned in their present circumstances as a kind of coping mechanism.

Because of the ‘institutionalisation’ of the alternate states of consciousness of the earliest Jesus-followers, an alternative community was formed. Although it is difficult to study alternate states of consciousness because of their psychological individuality, the result of experiencing them – the formation of an alternative community – can be studied much more easily because of its empirical appearance and externally witnessed evidence.

Method

My point of entry is that of current research, which indicates that the Eucharist can be seen as a symbolic rite. As with other symbols, the earliest Eucharist carried meaning because it was performed for a reason and it added value to people’s lives (cf. Beattie 1968:69–70).

Subsequently, my purpose is to indicate that the earliest Eucharist, as the institutionalising of a ceremony of open table fellowship, symbolised an alternative lifestyle within ‘baseline consciousness’. It bore meaning for one’s social life in the here and now experiences of the earliest Jesus-groups.

I intend to argue that the ceremonial participation of the earliest Jesus-followers was the result of alternate states of consciousness as expressed in anti-language. I aim at redirecting extant research concerning the origins of the ‘Christian’ Eucharist by means of a multidisciplinary methodological approach. The importance and relevance of this research are found in the enhancement of social inclusivity as an ideal in the present day.

The method I wish to employ is as follows: I shall firstly give attention to the reason why the earliest Jesus-followers participated in the Eucharist, which will entail an examination of the foundation of the earliest Eucharist. Then I shall discuss the value that participation in the Eucharist added to the lives of the earliest Jesus-followers, which will encompass an examination of Eucharistic formulae for traces of anti-language. Lastly, I shall examine the meaning entailed in participation in the Eucharist for the earliest Jesus-followers, which will further entail a discussion of holy meals as cultural, ceremonial symbols.

Reason: Foundation of the earliest Eucharist

Introduction

Did Jesus of Nazareth establish the Eucharist? This question has been posed over many years by different scholars (see e.g. Bultmann 1984:152–153; Feld 1976:4–39; Lietzmann 1967; Lohmeyer 1937:204–223, 1938:92–94). I want to propose that the ‘foundation’ of the Eucharist probably lies in the last meal of Jesus with his disciples, as well as in the other meals Jesus had.

Foundation of the Eucharist in the meals Jesus had

Bradshaw (2002:61–62) observes that one of the major difficulties faced by scholars with regard to the origins of the Eucharist is the question regarding to what extent the accounts of the Last Supper in the New Testament (Mt 26:17–30; Mk 14:12–26; Lk 22:7–38; 1 Cor 11:23–26) can be treated as reliable descriptions of an actual historical event and how far.
they have been affected by the later liturgical practices of the first generation of ‘Christians’.

Theißen (1999:130) states that Jesus’ ‘Last Supper’ was preceded by other communal meals which contained a symbolic surplus of meaning and that there is a possibility that at his Last Supper Jesus made a connection between his death and the supper. We see this in the ‘words of institution’. But the reference to Jesus’ death could have been created after Easter (on the basis of his execution, which had taken place in the meantime). This link can also be perceived in the Pauline variant of the words of institution, where the Last Supper is associated with the promise of the new covenant, which has nothing to do with sacrifices (Theißen 1999:130).

Funk and the Jesus Seminar (1998:141–142; cf. Crossan 1992:360–367) contribute to this discussion by concluding that the Last Supper as depicted in Mark 14:22–26 was probably not an historical event. On the other hand, they acknowledge that, since Jesus ate frequently with his followers, there must have been a last meal with them.

Crossan (1994:178) further points out that, if Jesus himself had ritualised a meal in which he identified bread and wine with his body and blood, it would be difficult to explain the absence of such symbolisation in Eucharistic texts like Didache 9–10. This leads Crossan (1994:178–179) to conclude that it was open commensality8 during Jesus’ life, rather than the Last Supper before his death, that was the root of any later ritualisation.

Crossan (1994) says:

The kingdom of God as a process of open commensality, of a non-discrimination table depicting in miniature a non-discrimination society, clashes fundamentally with honor and shame, those basic values of ancient Mediterranean culture and society.

(Crossan 1994:70)

For Jesus’ contemporaries, with their group-centred personalities, the:

idea of eating together and living together without any distinctions, differences, discriminations, or hierarchies is close to the irrational and absurd. And the one who advocates or does it is close to the deviant and the perverted. He has no honor. He has no shame.

Perrin (1967:102–108) views the tradition that Jesus offered table fellowship to outcasts as historical (Mt 11:16–19). He considers that Jesus’ table fellowship utilised the symbolism of the messianic banquet, as defined in Matthew 8:11. He perceives these texts as authentic to the historical Jesus, because they represent perspectives more appropriate to Jesus’ setting than to that of the ‘early church’. Perrin indicates that Jesus’ table fellowship explains how he came to die: his actions defied the boundaries of the community and thus functioned as an act of such offensiveness to Israelite sensibilities that the leaders of Israel called for his death. He asserts that this also explains how the earliest Jesus-groups came to eat a communal meal together; a practice that came into existence so early that it must have been a continuation of the practice of Jesus himself.

Perrin (1967:104–105) adds that the practice of communal meals amongst the earliest Jesus-followers existed long before there was a specific ‘Christian’ theology to accord it meaning. In his opinion we cannot argue that the meals are an echo of the ‘Last Supper’ held by Jesus with his disciples during the Passion, because, even if such an occasion as is reported in the Gospels is historical, it did not, in itself, give rise to the ‘early Christian’ practice. All of our evidence indicates that the kind of theological emphasis associated with the ‘Last Supper’ in the Gospels was by no means the major emphasis in the communal meals of the earliest Jesus-followers. He also argues that these early communal meals did not originate in the religious practice of ancient Israel, the reason being that the Passover meal was a yearly affair. The Qumran communal meal anticipating the ‘messianic banquet’ could also not have constituted the origin of the communal meals amongst the earliest Jesus-followers, because this was simply a special significance accorded to the regular communal meal at Qumran. The earliest Eucharist was something out of the ordinary which the earliest followers of Jesus enacted and which helped to give them a special identity. The most reasonable explanation is thus that the communal meals of the earliest Jesus-followers are a continuation of a regular practice of the ministry of Jesus.

Theißen (1999) likewise holds that the:

Eucharist came into being from the meals that Jesus held. In remembrance of the last supper it is related to the death of Jesus. And this death of Jesus in turn takes the place of the ancient sacrifices.

(Theißen 1999:124)

In other words, Theißen’s (1999:126; cf. Hooker 1997) thesis is that the Eucharist originated from the prophetic symbolic action with which Jesus delivered his ‘eschatological’ message (in opposition to the traditional rites). Only by its reference to the death of Jesus could this symbolic action become an early ‘Christian’ sacrament, because this reference gave it the power to supersede the traditional sacrifices.

Jesus’ ‘showing’ in his meals

In this section I argued that the foundation of the Eucharist can be found in the symbolic meals that Jesus of Nazareth shared with other people (‘showing’). Jesus had an alternative view of the world, which he displayed by means of inclusive meals, in which anyone could share, here and now. But to be a part of this world of Jesus, which can be termed the 8 Crossan (1994:68) defines the word ‘commensality’ as ‘the rules of tabling and eating as miniature models for the rules of association and socialization’, from the Latin word mensa which means table. According to him commensality refers to table fellowship as a map of economic discrimination, social hierarchy and political differentiation. Crossan (1994:66–69; cf. Scott 1990:161; Van Bruggen 1994:388–392) uses the parable in Matthew 22:1–13, Luke 14:15–24 and in the Gospel of Thomas 64, in which a person hosts a feast, sends a servant to invite his friends, but all the friends make excuses and then the host replaces the absent guests with anyone from the street, as an example. This could lead to a situation in which classes, genders and ranks could be mingled – anyone could be reclining amongst the earliest Jesus-followers, because this was simply not have constituted the origin of the communal meals.

---

‘kingdom of God’, whilst at the same time still living in the ordinary world, called for alternate states of consciousness. In the next section, the ‘telling’ of the earliest Jesus-followers will be described.

Value: Eucharistic formulae as anti-language

Introduction
In this section I explore the possibility that the ritualisation of the earliest Eucharist is a verbalisation, in anti-language, of an alternate state of consciousness. I will examine Eucharistic formulae in the New Testament and other early Christian literature, in order to show that anti-language is recognisable in what was said around the Eucharistic table. To say that you eat the body of Christ and drink the blood of Christ, whilst in practice you are eating bread and drinking wine, is nothing else than making use of the rich symbolism of anti-language. I will also undertake a cursory examination of similarities between the earliest Eucharist and the Graeco-Roman mystery religions, since this should help to highlight the role that alternate states of consciousness, as expressed in anti-language, played in the earliest Eucharist. In other words, this section of the article will be devoted to the earliest Jesus-followers’ ‘telling’. They started to ‘tell’ other people what Jesus ‘showed’ in his meals, because it added value to their lives.

Eucharistic formulae in the New Testament

A close look at Eucharistic formulae in the New Testament should make the use of anti-language apparent. The texts I refer to only serve as illustrations; I do not intend to provide a comprehensive overview of all the available Eucharistic texts.

The first example comprises the miraculous multiplication of loaves (Mk 6:30–44//Mt 14:13–21//Lk 9:10–17//Jh 6:1–14; Mk 8:1–10//Mt 15:32–39). Anti-language can be perceived in the disciples’ misconception that there was not enough bread to feed everyone – Jesus made sure that every single person could be fed. In the family of God no-one has to be sent away or remain hungry.

A second example narrates the story of the walk to Emmaus. The two disciples walk on the road – the ‘way’ is a codeword for the new religion. This constitutes an example of anti-language.

A third example is that of the meal described by Paul in 1 Corinthians 11:23–26 (the story of the ‘Last Supper’).

Numerous examples of anti-language occur in this passage. That Jesus refers to bread as his body and wine as his blood is probably the most obvious examples of anti-language found in all of the texts.

A fourth example comprises John’s description of the last supper that Jesus and his disciples ate together (Jn 13:1–17:26), a version that differs from the description of the Last Supper in the Synoptic Gospels. It is not a Passover meal and there are no references to any words of Jesus being uttered over bread and wine. But it is still a meal that refers symbolically to the death of Jesus and includes a command that the disciples should do as he has done (Jn 13:14–15). This supper is described in a parallel section to those in which the Last Supper is described in the other Gospels. But the interpretation of this meal is associated with a new ritual, the foot-washing, which indicates that the real significance of the shared meal is one of mutual service and mutual love (Theissen 1999:138; see Smith 2003:274). This is another example of Jesus ‘showing’. Although John does not describe a traditional Last Supper scene, he does include words of Jesus pronounced over bread and wine in another text (Jn 6:53–54), but without offering a profound religious interpretation of the elements (Theissen 1999:138). The reference to ‘eating flesh and drinking blood’ refers to the radical boundary now drawn between the Johannine community and its neighbouring synagogue community. And this boundary is created by means of anti-language. From the point of view of the Johannine community (now no longer a synagogue community but rather a meal community), it is the meal that constitutes a new boundary marker between the two communities, effectively supplementing, if not replacing, the synagogue as the boundary marker (Smith 2003:275).

Eucharistic formulae in non-Biblical texts

According to Smith and Tausig (1990:15; cf. Thurian & Wainwright 1983:111–115) the earliest texts that afford clear, unambiguous evidence for early forms of the liturgy of the Eucharist are not New Testament texts but those of the church fathers. This does not mean that the New Testament is not important in this regard, but it is considered to function in the form preserved in the church’s traditional interpretation rather than as an independent witness in itself.

Many documents outside of the New Testament furnish an account of early Eucharistic practices, for example, the Didache, the writings of Justin Martyr and the Traditio apostolica of Hippolytus.

If we study these early texts describing the Eucharist, a faint picture emerges of how this ceremony might have taken place in the early days: Only baptised people could participate in the Eucharist. After baptism, members of the congregation exchanged the kiss of peace, expressing reconciliation with each other, to mark the beginning of the Eucharist, the joyful response to Christ, expressed in the celebration of the Lord’s Supper (Justin, 1 Apol 65) (Oetting 1970:35).

The earliest celebrations of the Eucharist most probably took place in the setting of an actual meal, which is sometimes called the ἑγόμενον [love feast]. Each individual brought food, the congregation partook of it together, rich and poor alike and any food that was left over was given to the poor (see 1 Cor 11:18–22; Ignatius, c. 150). By the time of Justin Martyr (c. 150), the Eucharist seems to have been celebrated separately (Oetting 1970:36–37).

Leavened bread was used and the wine was mixed with water. The deacons took the elements to the worshippers. In addition, the newly baptised were given milk and honey to symbolise that they were babies in Christ but also to show that they were now in the Promised Land, the land ‘flowing with milk and honey’. Participants in the Eucharist believed that they received Christ’s body and blood in the Eucharist (Irenaeus, Haer IV.xviii; V.ii).

The Eucharist and the Graeco-Roman mystery religions

Numerous similarities are evident between the earliest Eucharist and some of the Graeco-Roman mystery religions (Meyer 1987:226). To illustrate this point, I shall provide a cursory commentary on two examples of mystery religions in this section. My purpose is to emphasise the important role that alternate states of consciousness, as well as their verbalisation in anti-language, played in these rites.

My first example comprises the mystery religion in honour of the Greek god Dionysos, also called Bacchus. Alternate states of consciousness are displayed in the participants’ roaming the forests and the mountains, clothing themselves in fawn skins and wielding thyrsi (Meyer 1987:63). The worshippers of Dionysos acknowledged his presence in the raw flesh of wild beasts, as well as the goblet of wine, in the phallus concealed in the liknon (a winnowing basket that might be used as a cradle for a baby) and also in the immortal human soul. A person who was confronted by the presence of Dionysos and became possessed by him could feel his power in many different ways: in ecstasy, in inebriation, in sexuality, or in spiritual bliss. Such a person became one with Dionysos and could even be called Bacche (feminine) or Bacchos (masculine) after the god himself. Little is known of the actual mysteries of Dionysos, but it appears that they usually included eating and drinking. In the archaic mysteries, the initiates were said to tear animals to pieces and eat the flesh raw, as a way of assimilating the Dionysian power embodied within the animal. In more serene rites, the meal was a banquet. The holy drink was ordinary wine, the gift of the god.

There is a very clear resemblance between this mystery religion and the earliest Eucharist, especially in the eating of the ‘flesh’ of the god and the drinking of wine, which was sometimes called ‘blood so sweet’ (Meyer 1987:93–94).

My second example stems from the mystery religion in honour of Mithras. The men devoted to Mithras entered the Mithraea, designed as caves and participated in various purifications, initiatory rites and ceremonial meals. Justin Martyr (Apol 66.4) records that the initiates took bread and a cup of water (or a cup of mixed water and wine – these elements may have been symbolic of the body and blood of the bull) and uttered certain formulas at a holy meal. The purpose of the Mithraic rituals was to effect salvation and transformation (Meyer 1987:199–200).

Once again the parallel with the earliest Eucharist is easily recognisable, especially in the ceremonial meals, in which the elements probably symbolically depicted the body and blood of the bull.

These similarities are explicable in terms of the shared milieu of the Graeco-Roman world (Meyer 1987:226). People participated in the mystery religions because the latter enriched their lives, just as participation in the Eucharist added value to the earliest Jesus-followers’ lives. The important role that alternate states of consciousness played in rites can perhaps be perceived more easily in the mystery religions than in the earliest Eucharist – this reinforces my theory that in the early Mediterranean world, alternate states of consciousness were part and parcel of ceremonies and that anti-language was used to verbalise these states (cf. Burkert 1987:114).

This concludes the present section regarding the ‘telling’ of the earliest Jesus-followers. The word about Jesus’ way of life, as illustrated in his open commensality, spread fast, because it added value to believers’ lives. Because participation in the Eucharist was an extraordinary event and because the Eucharist acted as the integration ceremony of an anti-society, ordinary language was not adequate to illustrate the way it enriched participants’ lives; therefore anti-language was employed. To be a part of early Jesus-groups imparted meaning to believers’ lives; they expressed this meaning by ‘re-enacting’ what they were ‘told’ Jesus had ‘showed’, by means of participating in the symbolic integration ceremony they called the Eucharist. In the next section this ‘re-enactment’ and the meaning it gave to their lives, will be discussed.

Meaning: Holy meals as a cultural ceremonial symbol of integration into an alternative society

Introduction

As indicated earlier, the earliest Jesus-followers formed an anti-society. People became members of this society because membership gave meaning to their lives; and membership was imparted by means of baptism. Once they had become members, the Eucharistic table was the occasion where

12. The celebration of the Lord’s Supper gets the name “Eucharist” from the prayer of thanksgiving that was said over the offerings [of food for the poor], as Justin suggests, “that we might give thanks to God for creating everything for the sake of man, for delivering us from the sin in which we were born, and for destroying the dominions and powers through Him who suffered” (Giol 14 — see Oetting 1970:37).

they demonstrated their solidarity with one another. Hence the Eucharist can be termed a ceremony of integration (see Theißen 1999:121). The Eucharist can be described as a ‘re-enactment’ of Jesus’ open commensality.

The Eucharist as ceremony of integration

The function of ceremonies is to co-ordinate life in communities. According to Theißen (1999:122–123), this process took place mainly through sacrifices (see Hanson 1979:28), especially where these were connected with shared meals. This leads Theißen to conclude that the earliest Eucharist was a ceremony of integration, which was constantly repeated and renewed the cohesion of the community, especially because it replaced the earlier sacrifices (cf. Koch 2001:239; Meier 1997:267; Pilch 1996c:95–96).

As a rule, rites are ancient and have been practiced since primal times. In contrast, the Eucharist is a new rite, because it originated with a charismatic figure of the recent past – Jesus (see Theißen & Merz 1996:359–360). To Theißen (1999:126), ‘Jesus provided the stimulus for the eucharist by associating with his person at his last supper…meals which were held repeatedly’. The meals that Jesus hosted originally were prophetic symbolic actions (i.e. patterns of action focused on a unique situation, in order to convey a message) (cf. Pilch 1981:109, 1996c:95–96). The unique situation of these meals encompassed the fact that they were held in the face of the imminent end of the world and that they could not be separated from their founder. Their message proclaimed that God’s salvation is made present through fellowship with toll collectors and sinners – with a view to the ‘eschatological’ feast in the kingdom of God to which all people will stream from all over the world (Theißen 1999:126–127).

Theißen (1999:127) therefore concludes that the Eucharist is a threshold ritual, which opens the way to a new world. Jesus held his meals in anticipation of the eschatological feast in the kingdom of God (Mk 14:25). In threshold rituals we find an anti-structure to the traditional forms of life: ‘In celebrating a meal with his disciples in Passover week…to which he repeatedly’. The meals that Jesus hosted originally were prophetic symbolic actions (i.e. patterns of action focused on a unique situation, in order to convey a message) (cf. Pilch 1981:109, 1996c:95–96). The unique situation of these meals encompassed the fact that they were held in the face of the imminent end of the world and that they could not be separated from their founder. Their message proclaimed that God’s salvation is made present through fellowship with toll collectors and sinners – with a view to the ‘eschatological’ feast in the kingdom of God to which all people will stream from all over the world (Theißen 1999:126–127).

As a rule, rites are ancient and have been practiced since primal times. In contrast, the Eucharist is a new rite, because it originated with a charismatic figure of the recent past – Jesus (see Theißen & Merz 1996:359–360). To Theißen (1999:126), ‘Jesus provided the stimulus for the eucharist by associating with his person at his last supper…meals which were held repeatedly’. The meals that Jesus hosted originally were prophetic symbolic actions (i.e. patterns of action focused on a unique situation, in order to convey a message) (cf. Pilch 1981:109, 1996c:95–96). The unique situation of these meals encompassed the fact that they were held in the face of the imminent end of the world and that they could not be separated from their founder. Their message proclaimed that God’s salvation is made present through fellowship with toll collectors and sinners – with a view to the ‘eschatological’ feast in the kingdom of God to which all people will stream from all over the world (Theißen 1999:126–127).

The earliest Eucharist and alternate states of consciousness

As I suggested earlier, participation in the earliest Eucharist implied the experience of alternate states of consciousness. The notion of eating together with gods or spirits is found in many cultures. The idiom of commensality is one of mutual respect and good will; sharing food or drink with a ghost or spirit, as with anybody else, implies amity and, especially, reconciliation (Beattie 1968:234).

Jesus claimed that he could already enter the kingdom of God and that the kingdom of God could already be realised for people who lived their lives as he did (Crossan 2003:49). This was symbolised by participating in the Eucharist. The Eucharist made the kingdom of God a reality in the present lives of the participants. We should keep in mind that the earliest Jesus-followers adopted an apocalyptic worldview (see Marxsen 1979:107–108; Van Henten & Mellink 1998:12).

In the practice of the earliest Jesus-followers, of regularly celebrating the ‘Last Supper’ until Christ would return (‘in memory of Christ’), this apocalyptic worldview is foregrounded. By doing this, they experienced ‘another’ time, the time of God, as breaking into ordinary time. This is nothing else than the experience of an alternate state of consciousness.

We know that sharing the same cup implied sharing in the meaning of that cup as well (as in the Israelite Passover tradition). This is why Jesus asked God to let the cup pass him by in Gethsemane (Mk 14:35–36), because he knew what this image implied (cf. Smith 2003:251; see Bolkestein 1977:328–329). The two disciples (Mk 10:35–40) did not understand the implication of their request to sit at the left and right hand side of Jesus in his glory (Bolkestein 1977:237–240). The second most important person (after the host) always sat at his right-hand side and was required to drink first. The implication of this is that, if one drinks from the cup at the Eucharistic table, one shares in Jesus’ fate, since the cup is placed in conjunction with the cross. But by choosing to die, one in actual fact gains life. All of this makes sense if understood from an apocalyptic perspective, in conjunction with alternate states of consciousness and anti-language.

By means of taking part in the Eucharist, the earliest Jesus-followers thus already participated in the kingdom of God. Since the world around them was continuing its natural course, this experience must have taken place in alternate states of consciousness.

Anti-society and the earliest Eucharist

The earliest Jesus-followers formed an anti-society, structured on the basis of a fictive kinship. If we bear in mind that Jesus-movements were already characterised by great diversity at a very early stage (Pelser 1987:557), we need to ask the question how a sense of cohesion could develop so easily. How could individuals from diverse ethnic, religious and social backgrounds come to call one another ‘brothers and sisters’? How were these bonds created and experienced? Smith (2003:184) theorises that the most likely locus for this development is the community meal, with its unparalleled power to define social boundaries and create social bonding.

Smith (2003:184–185) suggests that we see this development taking place especially in Paul. The meal had already become a focus for communal identity prior to Paul. To meet for a meal was a natural thing to do and to develop social bonds as a result was expected. But soon there developed a distinctive theological rationale for the community meal – it came to be defined as a memorial feast commemorating the death of Jesus. This was the shape of the meal that Paul inherited. Smith (2003:184–185) also writes that, with this development, a ‘new wrinkle’ was taking shape with the wholesale inclusion of Gentiles in the Jesus-groups. Up until this point, the ‘people of God’ had been the people of Israel and their status was indicated by the boundary markers of circumcision and some level of adherence to laws of purity. As long as the community was drawn primarily from an Israeliite and proselyte constituency, these boundaries could still be assumed. But when Gentiles began to claim community membership as Gentiles, something new was starting to occur. How could Gentiles come to believe that they were part of God’s people without being circumcised? This process had begun with the initiation rite of baptism. But Smith (2003:185; cf. Elliott 1991:387) illustrates that it was participation in the meal that provided the catalyst for this development. It was the meal that created a sense of belonging, of social bonding with the community.

The meaning of Jesus’ open commensality
What did the Eucharist signify for the earliest followers of Jesus? De Jonge (2001:210; cf. Danker 2000:415; Pelser n.d.:167) considers that the purpose of the community meal was the realisation of the communion [κοινωνία] which the members of the congregation felt they missed in the outside world. They believed that Christ was present in the meal and they prayed that they would be united with one another and with Christ and would share in the joys of eternity (Stevenson 1989:62–63). In the Eucharist the whole community thus participates in the death and resurrection of Christ (Cullmann 1969:29–30).

Table fellowship was very important amongst the cultures of the Mediterranean basin in the 1st century: Mealtimes were ‘laden with meanings’ that exceeded consumption of food (Bartchy 2002:175). Being welcomed at a table to eat with another person was a ceremony richly symbolic of friendship, intimacy and social unity. The context within which meals were consumed comprised the extended family. Beyond the household, people preferred to eat with persons from their own social class. Invitations to meals were given to people with the same social, religious and economic status, in order that the invited person could return the favour in a relationship of balanced reciprocity.

Bartchy (2002:176; see Douglas 1972:79–80) contends that everyone in the 1st century Mediterranean world would expect that meals would constitute exclusive occasions in which honour was given to those to whom honour was due. In contrast to this, Jesus did exactly the opposite. For him honour was still a key value, but he made honour by birth and acquired honour irrelevant: he bestowed everyone (without regard for social status, personal accomplishment, purity or health) with honour in the name of Israel’s God. Instead of seeking honour for himself, Jesus was prepared to be humiliated. For him, in contrast to the popular understanding, honour was not in limited supply. His God offered an unlimited supply of honour; in turn, those honoured by God possessed the social resources to accord honour to others without fear of diminishing their own. Non-retaliation thus became the only honourable response to a challenge to one’s personal honour. Meals became an especially prominent occasion for this outrageous giving of honour to all, around a radically inclusive table (Bartchy 2002:181–182).

In conclusion, the two basic ethical values amongst the earliest Jesus-followers, according to Theißen (1999:63), were love of neighbour and renunciation of status. Since everybody who believed in Christ and was baptised could participate in the Eucharist on an equal level, the Eucharist could be viewed as the place where the ‘early Christian’ ethic was lived out.

Conclusion
In this article I have attempted to demonstrate that the earliest Eucharist represented an anti-language verbalisation of alternate states of consciousness. By participating in the Eucharist, the earliest followers of Jesus experienced the presence of God amongst them. They spoke about this experience in anti-language, since ordinary language was not adequate to verbalise such an extraordinary experience. All of this exerted a lasting effect on their lives – they lived according to the example Jesus set, because they believed that they participated in his death and resurrection. They were now part of a new family. The earliest Jesus-followers shared a special relationship with each other, as well as with Jesus (in alternate states of consciousness) and they illustrated this by means of the ceremony of the Eucharist.

The reason why the earliest Jesus-followers placed a strong emphasis on participating in the ceremony of the Eucharist, was that Jesus ‘showed’ them what it was like to be part of the kingdom of God, by means of the meals in which he participated. The earliest Jesus-followers ‘told’ this to others, by means of anti-language, which we can trace back to early texts bearing witness to the earliest Eucharist, because of the value which participation in the Eucharist added to their lives. Then early Jesus-groups ‘re-enacted’ what they had been told by means of the ceremony of the Eucharist, because the latter gave meaning to their lives. Although they were persecuted, they apocalyptically experienced the presence of God directly in their lives, by means of alternate states of consciousness. This experience changed their lives, because they now lived according to a new ethic, as ‘brothers and sisters’ in faith.
At the beginning of the article I expressed the hope that this study might assist us in realising once again what kind of value the Eucharist can add to our lives today, especially since institutionalised churches are entering a phase of deinstitutionalisation and this ceremony was developed before formative Christianity became an institution. Although the Eucharist still plays an important role in the liturgy of many Christian churches today, the spiritual dimension that was so important in the 1st century seems to be lacking in institutionalised churches within a Eurocentric context. The Eucharist symbolised an all-inclusive ethical lifestyle, whilst people today are excluded from the Eucharist on the grounds of not having fulfilled all the necessary 'liturgical requirements'. A Eucharist where 'Jew' and 'Greek', 'slave' and 'free', 'male' and 'female' cannot equally share in the body and blood of Christ, has the opposite effect to the original intention of the Eucharist.

The Eucharist represents the symbolic 're-enactment' of that which Jesus 'showed'. It is the re-experiencing of an alternative state. By one's participation in the Eucharist, the 'ordinary' world is interrupted by something out of the ordinary. That which Jesus experienced in his alternate state of consciousness, can also be experienced in this ceremony, namely that the kingdom of God is imminent, that it differs from the ordinary world and that people can share in it in an inclusive way. This was the case in Jesus’ time and it can still be the case today, if we once again attach a similar meaning to the Eucharist as that which the earliest Jesus-followers did.

References

Esler, P.F., 2003, Conflict and identity in Romans: The social setting of Paul’s letter, Fortress, Minneapolis, MN.

Gerhardsson, B., 1979, 'The mighty acts of Jesus according to Matthew, Gleeurup, Lund. (Scripta Minora 5).

